

English Grammar Really Does Matter

Whether we are talking about a five-year-old that is about to start learning to read or whether we are talking about a thirty-year-old woman who is attempting to write a thesis for her master's degree, we cannot deny the fact that taking time to learn proper English grammar is important. When we see or hear about English grammar, our immediate reaction is to cringe. They are reminded of junior high and high school English class and the way that their English teachers made them do English grammar exercise after exercise.

Because English grammar is usually seen in such a negative sense, it is all the more important that people replace those lies with the truth that learning English grammar really is important for anyone who wants to have a proper perspective of the English language. When we are speaking or hearing English, not too many of us take the time to think about the fact that English grammar is the very thing that allows us to communicate with and understand one another. It is not so much because we use the same words of the English language, but it is because we all put our words together in certain ways to form thoughts and sentences that we can understand each other. This, in short, is the purpose of English grammar.

English grammar is the mechanics of the English language that allows for two people who use the same vocabulary to be able to communicate without misunderstanding. Certainly, there will always be some level of misunderstanding that happens when two people communicate, but so much of our problems will be lessened if we all take some time to learn English grammar.

Many schools today are moving away from making English grammar write successfully, they will likely never learn the English grammar or the reasons why they are speaking and writing as they are. Being able to speak, understand and write a language is an important part of being successful no matter what you do in life. Taking the time to learn even the basics of English grammar will go far in helping people communicate even better.
